1.- The training of the troops during the period of an armistice and during demobilization is of the first importance. The object of such training must be :-

(i) to maintain the high standard of discipline which has characterised the British Armies throughout the War and prepare it for the resumption of hostilities should this take place.

(ii) to fit those returning to civil life for their future occupations.

2.- Training will therefore consist of :-

- (a) Military Training.
- (b) Educational Training.
- (c) Recreational Training.

Military training and work should be restricted to 3 or 4 hours a day at the most (including any work such as salvago, filling in trenches, etc.) It should aim at producing a high standard of drill, and special attention should be paid to dress and equipment, and to the general appearance of the troops on and off parade. Route marching should be included. Ceremonial parades will be hold when the weather is fine. Demonstrations should be arranged in the use of balloons for observation, sound ranging, flash spotting, anti-aircraft shooting, projectors, trench mortars, wireless telegraphy and telephony etc. Visits should be arranged between detachments of different arms. 30 yards ranges will be built and shooting competitions arranged by every unit.

Educational Training will be carried out in all formations and units, by the formation of voluntary classes. Special facilities will be given to enable all ranks to attend these classes by excusing them from at least 1 hour's military training a day, and, as far as possible, from fatigues. Lectures will be arranged on "After the War Problems".

Recreational Training will be encouraged by the organisation of competitions in football, running, boxing, etc., in all formations and units. Brigade, Division and Corps Staffs will assist regimental and other officers in the organisation of such
